FACULTY ADVISOR'S ADDRESS

With this magazine, we endeavour to bring in the voices of people who are marginalized in our society. Having expertise in the field of international studies, one would like to establish the link between the concept of marginality and International Relations (IR). At global level, the status of few countries being considered as “core” and the others as “satellite” nations is again a reflection of marginality. Entire debate on Global North versus Global South is something which encapsulates the idea of latter being a marginalized society at large. The indepth analysis of marginality and international relations points towards a very interesting phenomenon of women being absent from international relations. The dominance of men in IR in almost every quarter such as diplomacy, at war, in the International Organizations has posed a vital question regarding the marginalization of women in this field. The role of women is often ignored and not accounted for society is oblivion to the fact that it is women who are care providers when men are fighting wars at borders. Women have silently worked at intelligence units without taking credit of their work. Despite this, women are considered unfit to debate on the matters which are considered “hard” from the perspective of realist school of thought. Therefore, this special issue intends to throw some light on the voices of people who are operating from the margins of the society and thereby making it inclusive in nature.
